Interest in the use of microcapsules has increased as new or improved applications for encapsulated bioactive materials have arisen. These emerging applications include, for example, the incorporation of pharmaceuticals for ocular and sublingual delivery, and the immobilization of enzymes. The use of bioactive agents such as proteins and other organic compounds is widespread in modern medicine. Many of these bioactive agents, particularly proteins, peptides, and other organic compounds, are unsuitable for oral delivery. In many cases, oral delivery of bioactive agents is difficult due to their susceptibility to enzymatic degradation in the gastrointestinal (GI) tract and their poor absorption following oral administration.
