Effects of azelastine hydrochloride, a new anti-allergic drug, on mucociliary clearance. The effects of azelastine hydrochloride (AH), a new anti-allergic drug, on mucociliary clearance were investigated in guinea pigs and in human subjects. AH inhalation did not affect the ciliary beat frequency of the ciliated mucous membrane of the trachea, but it slightly increased the frequency in the bronchi. AH inhalation inhibited actively the mucociliary movement in the bronchi more than in the trachea. Moreover, AH aerosol increased the mucociliary clearance by 37% in human subjects in a dose-dependent manner. These results suggest that AH is a useful anti-allergic drug, and a sufficient effect is expected when inhaled during asthmatic attacks.

The present invention relates to an abrasive article and more specifically, to a semi-transparent abrasive article having a non-abrasive surface layer of an amorphous silica. Abrasive articles are well known in the art for use in a variety of applications including, for example, use in abrading or finishing of various materials or objects, including, for example, surface preparation of inorganic materials such as glass, ceramic, stone, concrete, metal and the like, and surface preparation of organic materials such as wood, leather, plastic, rubber, fiberglass, and the like. Abrasive articles are commonly used in polishing, planishing, or buffing of the surfaces of the above materials. An abrasive article may typically comprise a backing material, one or more abrasive materials, and an overlay. Abrasive articles are available in various shapes, including, for example, cylindrical, belt, disc, and the like. Abrasive articles are generally rigid and often used with relatively high rotational speeds to achieve a
