The third developer diary for Path of Exile. This is a talk about the current state of the game's development. There's a lot of discussion of features that have been cut because of budgetary constraints. So hopefully this will help you get a bit more of an idea of what the game will look like when it's eventually released. We have some of our own artwork and video of the game that can be used here.

Path of Exile will be 100% free to play. In this developer diary, we will answer a few questions that you may have regarding our decision to be 100% free to play. Playing Path of Exile will be completely free, but there will be optional content that you can purchase with real money to enhance your gameplay experience. Having optional in-game purchases isn't some evil act on our part that breaks the game; we feel that going this route makes us more likely to provide better service to our players in the long run. However, we want to make sure that you have the option of not buying items to enhance your gameplay experience in the game.

- Will there be a level cap?
- Will there be a required item level for character upgrades?
- How will character items be equipped? Will there be invincibility frames?
- Will player stats be saved between an offline or online character?

Welcome, the latest developer diary brought to you by Grinding Gear Games. In this diary we'll be going over the Nether, making you a Boar, getting stoned, and showing you what's on sale in the Empire's shops.

Today's developer diary is brought to you by Grinding Gear Games. In this diary, Leshrac will give you his view on the stage that the game is going to take.

The game is being created in a way that benefits from both sides of the new generation. We want to provide a free-to-play experience to people who don't have a lot of extra
